

I am completely satisfied with the Indiana No-Call List and the way that it currently operates. The proposal by the Consumer Banker's Association appears to be an attempt to weaken the Indiana No-Call law. Their rational is to create a national standard, but in fact they want access to my privacy via un-invited telephone calls. If a national standard is considered appropriate, let the Indiana law be the model, in it's current form. It works! We are happy with it's effectiveness.

If the Banker's proposal is adopted, not only will banks gain undesireable access to my home and privacy, but Cable TV and Satelite TV companies also may gain access. Which other businesses and organizations may pile on to such a weakening of the provisions of the Indiana law is difficult to predict. Many telemarketers have attempted to break the Indiana law in Indiana courts, but have failed. It appears they are now trying to use the power of the federal government to override the state's right to self determination.

Please deny the Banker's proposal the override portions of the Indiana No-Call Law.
